

MERGING WISELY

Best Practices for Structuring Successful Nonprofit Mergers

by Lewis Horowitz and Julia Abelev

A merger in the nonprofit world is no less complicated than the merger of a for-profit corporation, but the metrics of success are different. Nonprofit organizations structured around values and achieving a mission as opposed to a bottom line may need to think even harder about whether a merger aligns with their goals, clients, and world view.

The dynamics of bringing donors, board members, and employees onto the same page is the greatest challenge faced by nonprofits seeking to merge or acquire another entity. This article shares some wisdom borne from the experience of our firm and others on how to get from pitching the idea to the donors to successfully merging organizations. For each stage of the merger process, we provide best practices so nonprofit organizations can be well-armed to think several steps ahead and ultimately end at a bright future post-merger.

STAGE 1: PREMERGER NEGOTIATIONS

The premerger negotiations phase sets the stage for the entire merger. At this point, the parties must develop the values critical for the negotiations, agree on a means of formalizing their desire to move forward, and assemble a team whose task is to shepherd the merger.

Values Consensus

The start of any merger process begins with the most important discussion of all — developing a common values-based goal that both corporations can rally around. The importance of this cannot be overstated. “When organizations were able to identify potential mutual gains that could be realized in the merger there was a statistically greater likelihood that staff would integrate well into the new organization.”¹

Memorializing a Memorandum of Understanding

Once the parties are on the same values page, they should draft a brief document akin to a letter of intent or memorandum of understanding, memorializing the framework for the deal, disclosure schedules, and confidentiality requirements.

Assembling the Merger Team

At this stage, many experts recommend putting together a “dream team” to manage the merger. In addition to board members and various stakeholders, there are three other types of people that could be of value at this stage:

Merger consultant. The 2012 MAP for Nonprofits report cited above found in its study sample that 86% of the mergers it studied included a merger consultant. They were found to add value as experts, facilitate discussions, and sometimes take on highly specialized roles such as interim executive directors.²

Joint merger committee. The benefits of a joint merger committee include creating a smaller decision-making group, ensuring both boards have representatives, always communicating, and maximizing technical skill already available on the boards.³ Several articles and studies have concluded that a task force or committee focused on the merger minimizes procedural mistakes and the escalation of tensions. It is also worth considering adding a special staff merger team to ensure proper staff integration and investment.⁴

Lawyers. Joint defense/representation agreements are common in this space to reduce costs; however, joint representation — much as in any other context — should be approached with caution, especially if the law firm chosen typically represents one of the merger entities.

STAGE 2: MERGER AGREEMENT

The strength of the merger agreement depends on the thought that goes into its foundation. The parties should engage all relevant stakeholders when drafting the terms and try to preempt possible issue areas to minimize disagreements down the line.

Building Stakeholder Support

Before any serious drafting may occur, it is crucial to begin reaching out to stakeholders and generating buy-in. MAP for Nonprofits identifies four stakeholder groups of particular importance: executive staff champions; board members; clients, consumers, and funders (treated as one group of external stakeholders); and the nonprofits’ staff members.

Executive staff champions. Studies indicate that having internal leadership on board with the transaction has a potent effect on steering the process along. A key leader with a vision becomes the executive champion — the one who pushes along the agenda and keeps morale high.

Board members. A unified board front is fundamental. Each merging corporation’s board has independent authority to approve or reject the merger. The board takes on a particularly active role by laying all of the merger groundwork. If there are any rifts on the board or disgruntled members, the process will hit logjams each step of the way.

Clients, consumers, and funders. Early and frequent communication with customers, clients, and funders ensures that everyone is on board as the merger agreement and formal contracts take shape. Customers and clients should feel comfortable with the surviving corporation and its ability to continue the services they have come to expect. Each board should sit down with major funders and get substantive buy in from each — essentially pledges to financially support the new entity. Throughout this process of outreach, it is important to think of those shadow stakeholders whose interests will fundamentally affect the success of a merger, such as well-connected community members, committed volunteers, and government officials.

Staff members. Staff should be brought on board early to give them a sense of ownership in the merger process. “[I]nvolvement of non-administrative staff prior to merger are all associated with a significant number of positive outcomes following merger. Specifically: financial stability, service quality and/or expansion, organizational reputation, and the alignment of staffing with client needs.”⁵ The staff members need to feel that their interests matter. “Whether a merger results in re-assigning roles, creating graceful exits, or developing new leadership positions in the merged entity, crafting a plan for senior staff that the staff itself considers fair and in the organization’s best interests is a critical step if the parties are to actually tie the knot.”⁶

Drafting the Merger Agreement: Issues to Consider

Once all the right parties are invested in the merger, the actual drafting of the merger agreement can happen. Here is a list of considerations (beyond what is required by state statutes) that should inform the drafting of the agreement.

Brand stewardship. Select the merged entity’s brand based on the emotional and financial strength of each merging company’s brand. This may involve dropping one of the brands, creating a public brand partnership, or creating a new amalgam brand.

Mission/vision. As discussed in earlier sections, the parties need to have an honest conversation about why the merger is taking place, who it serves, and what the larger goals of the new organization should be. Reaching a consensus on this will inform the rest of the transaction.

Timeline. The parties need to be realistic about how long negotiations may take, with the exact timeline that reflects how much legwork the organizations have already done and the relative complexity of the parties. If organizations are smaller and/or on tight budgets, the merger could take place surprisingly quickly.

Board structure and executive leadership. Crucial questions remain about board, leadership, and programming. A common approach is combining the boards and allowing for attrition to eventually get the new board to the right size over a few years.

Transfer of liabilities and contracts. It is crucial to discuss which liabilities and contracts will transfer and which will be closed out before the merger finalizes. Con-

"With proper planning, a nonprofit merger can be an invaluable tool for increasing an organization's social impact and finances."

consider all possible sources of liability, including contracts, employees, pending court cases, etc.

Transfer of funds and budget. This is where keeping the funders in the loop is critical. According to the Stanford Social Innovation Review, funders can be responsible for "codifying and sharing know-how on all forms of alliances, connecting grantees that could become more than the sum of their parts, and providing financial support for the due diligence and integration costs." Importantly, funders should pledge up front that they will maintain their donations after the merger. If government funders are the main source, it is important to check with the sponsoring organization to make sure no grants are put at risk by a merger.

Administrative/overhead escalation. Nonprofits are accustomed to lean operations, but a merger will produce increased need for sophisticated administrative and support staff. "The newly merged organization . . . because it's typically larger, may have to professionalize systems that could just 'get by' before."⁷ This includes thinking about accounting, human resources, physical relocations, and who will fill the new roles.

Programmatic planning. Because each nonprofit has built a brand and a mission with strong emotive backing, it may be difficult to let go of redundant or unnecessary programs. Such discussions should begin early, especially if staff reductions or cultural shifts are required.

Define the merger process. This includes more than just timelines but also authority transitions, phase out and phase in periods, financial deadlines, and amending procedures. MAP found that several merging entities felt that such front-end planning and preemption saved all parties much hassle when disputes or timing concerns arose.⁸

With all of the above factors in play and memorialized, due diligence can begin.

STAGE 3: DUE DILIGENCE

Conducting thorough due diligence not only shields the nonprofit from an unhappy merger but also protects individual board members. "Courts have held that that the members of the board of directors of a corporation that recommends a merger to shareholders or members can be personally and individually responsible if untoward results occur from the merger and the board members had failed to closely examine the merger partners in advance. Due diligence is thus an insurance policy for each governing board involved in the merger."⁹

Each corporation should conduct independent as well as joint due diligence in order to maximize information. The categories of exchanged information include corporate documents, financial materials, fundraising records, third-party contracts, and personnel records. The timing of the due diligence is just as important as the substance of the exchange: phase the due diligence and make sure highly sensitive information (i.e., donor lists) is not exchanged too early in the process.

STAGE 4: APPROVALS

The actual legal enactment of the merger follows the state law requirements for approval. Note that third parties may have to approve a merger, such government entities, funders or donors with restrictions, banks, and insurance companies.

STAGE 5: CLOSING AND INTEGRATION

The closing itself is rarely an issue. State law dictates the required filings. The larger concern is what to do after closing: the process of integrating staff, programs, and boards. The integration process consists of two parts: cultural integration and board/member integration.¹⁰

The best way to address each type of integration concern is to ensure that there is constant communication with staff, a clear mission from the beginning of the merger process, and several opportunities for continued discussions during the first few years, allowing for systems changes when needed. If the steps laid out in the earlier sections are followed, the integration should be smoother due to opportunities for staff and stakeholders to interact repeatedly in forums designed for such impactful conversations.

CONCLUSION

The moving pieces in a nonprofit merger require looking several steps ahead at every point and always balancing the interests of the board, donors, and staff. With proper planning, a nonprofit merger can be an invaluable tool for increasing an organization's social impact and finances. But only if the two corporations follow best practices, align their visions early, and check in frequently. NWL

LEWIS M. HOROWITZ is chair of Lane Powell's taxation practice group and co-chair of the cannabis practice group. Lewis is also a certified exit planning advisor qualified to assist private companies with their succession planning. He can be reached at horowitzl@lanepowell.com or 206-223-7401.

JULIA ABELEV is an attorney at Lane Powell and focuses her practice on corporate and transactional matters, with particular emphasis on intellectual property management, mergers, corporate governance and general corporate counseling. She regularly advises nonprofit corporations on governance and strategic planning. She can be reached at abelev@lanepowell.com or 206-223-7111.

NOTES

1. MAP for Nonprofits, "Synopsis: Success Factors in Nonprofit Mergers," at p.10 (July 2012) (hereafter MAP 2012), available online at www.wilder.org/Wilder-Research/Publications/Studies/Nonprofit%20Mergers/Synopsis%20-%20Success%20Factors%20in%20Nonprofit%20Mergers.pdf.
2. Ellis Carter, "Mechanics of a Nonprofit Merger," CharityLawyer: Daily Dose of Nonprofit Law (Feb. 10, 2012), available online at <http://charitylawyerblog.com/2012/02/10/mechanics-of-a-nonprofit-merger/>.
3. Ellis Carter, "Collaboration Case Study—Successful Merger," CharityLawyer: Daily Dose of Nonprofit Law (Nov. 13, 2009), available online at <http://charitylawyerblog.com/2009/11/13/collaboration-case-study-%e2%80%93-successful-merger/>.
4. MAP for Nonprofits, "What do we know about nonprofit mergers? Findings from a literature review, focus group, and key informant interviews," at p.29 (March 2011) (hereafter MAP 2011), available online at www.mapfornonprofits.org/wp-content/uploads/2013/10/What-do-we-know-about-nonprofit-mergers.pdf.
5. MAP 2012, supra note 1, at 12.
6. Katie Smith Milway, et al., "Why Nonprofit Mergers Continue to Lag," Stanford Social Innovation Review (Spring 2014), available online at http://ssir.org/articles/entry/why_nonprofit_mergers_continue_to_lag.
7. Alfredo Vergara-Lobo, et al., "The M Word: A Board Member's Guide to Mergers: How, Why & Why Not to Merge Nonprofit Organizations," CompassPoint (2005) (hereafter CompassPoint), available online at http://conservationtools-production.s3.amazonaws.com/library_item_files/1153/1053/445_mwordfinal2005.pdf?AWSAccessKeyId=AKIAIQFJLILYG-VDR4AMQ&Expires=1466388484&Signature=W1bVyfVmT%2BOvcD1bGtWMHJgn-CyQ%3D.
8. MAP 2011, supra note 4, at 35.
9. Jerald A. Jacobs, "All About Mergers of Nonprofit Organizations," Pillsbury Winthrop Shaw Pittman LLP (July 2008), available online at www.pillsburylaw.com/publications/all-about-mergers-of-nonprofit-organizations.
10. MAP 2011, supra note 4, at 33.

In whatever capacity they act, and no matter the size of an individual's account or estate, it has been my experience that the people at BECU Trust Services care about their clients, are completely supportive, and go above and beyond the call of duty in working with and assisting their clients and their families.

—Michelle Lynn Graunke, Attorney

PERSONALIZED TRUSTS FOR FAMILIES WITH SPECIAL NEEDS

When it comes to securing the financial future of a disabled beneficiary, your client's estate plan is decidedly about more than just money. BECU Trust Services is dedicated to the philosophy of people helping people. Unlike some banks and trust companies, we don't shy away from the complex fiduciary duties that come with Special Needs Trusts.

Our full service team is well-versed in the finer points of Special Needs Trust Administration. We can help your client provide for a beneficiary while preserving Medicaid and SSI by creating a customized trust for their specific circumstances.

Find out how BECU Trust Services can work with you to protect your clients' needs. Contact us today.

Trust Administration | Beneficiary Protection | Personalized Trusts

becu.org/trust | 206-812-5176

TRUST SERVICES

BECU Trust Services is a trade name used by MEMBERS® Trust Company under license from BECU. Trust services are provided by MEMBERS® Trust Company, a federal thrift regulated by the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency. Trust and investment products are not deposits of or guaranteed by the trust company, a credit union or credit union affiliate, are not insured or guaranteed by the NCUA, FDIC or any other governmental agency, and are subject to investment risks, including possible loss of the principal amount invested.